Acts of War (beta) was also one of the first games to feature a ranking system in the form of points. The ranks were tracked individually by players, and the overall ranking was displayed to all players in the player board. Not only that, but there was a real monetary prize system in place for the highest ranked player of each of the three rankings. To create this, publishers were given a set number of in-game credits, with a value of around 1 million for the first game and around 100 million for Acts of War II. Each month, players with the most credits would be awarded a free copy of their game, and the top finisher in each nation would also be awarded a free copy. The winners in each country would then be awarded a set number of free in-game credits, the amount of which would be roughly equal to the monthly credit prize. This system, known as the "monthly credit prize", was also used in the EA Mobilization game War in Europe, which ran for eight months and was later followed by the two game sequels World War One and II, which also continued the monthly credit prize scheme. The method of currency used in Acts of War was the Crown Coin, introduced in the first Act of War, and was replaced by the EM Artifact in Act of War II, which also saw the introduction of currency values. Finally, Acts of War III also introduced the "Dead Money" prize system, which would award in-game credits to the player with the most money held in the bank.

The monthly credit prize was later simplified into the "free game" prize in Act of War IV, which was later replaced by a free game for every rank for Act of War V, which was followed by a prize system based on collected land in the future game, Act of War VI, and finally, Act of War VII, which introduced a method of awarding prizes based on your nation's rank in the world. In order to comment on stories you must be registered and logged in. Register now!
