Astrocyte intracellular pH is maintained at the resting pH in the central nervous system. Resting extracellular pH (pHe) in the CNS is near neutral (7.35), yet acid-base disorders have been reported in the CNS of epileptic patients. Although astrocytes in brain are well-known to possess an important buffering system to maintain pHe, it has been difficult to explain the mechanisms that underlie these alterations. Recently, we reported that astrocytes and their surrounding glia limitans in the adult rat brain have a resting pHi of 7.25, almost coincident with the pHe. Moreover, the glia limitans astrocytes may function as "acid-sinks" for acidification of astrocytes. In the present study, we further tested the hypothesis that the resting pHi and pHe are closely related in the adult rat brain. The pH of cultured rat brain astrocytes was measured using 2',7'-bis-(2-carboxyethyl)-5(6)-carboxyfluorescein and Fura-2. In the presence of 0.6 mM extracellular HCO_3^- at resting pHe 7.35, resting pHi of 7.32 +/- 0.03 was maintained within a narrow range. Moreover, when resting pHe was lowered to 6.9, resting pHi immediately dropped to 6.63 +/- 0.02. Addition of 10 mM HCO_3^- to the low pHe condition further depressed pHi to 6.44 +/- 0.04. Acidification of cultured astrocytes by nigericin or by lowering pHe by titrating with HCl resulted in a simultaneous decrease in pHi and pHe. These results indicate that cultured astrocytes in the adult rat brain have a resting pHi of 7.25. Acidic external pHe can depress resting pHi, but it does not affect resting pHi of astrocytes. Thus, it is unlikely that astrocytes act as pHi regulators for the resting pHe in the brain.Enhanced energy and nutrient metabolism in thyroid-deficient chicks under high temperatures. 1. The effect of perinatal thyroidectomy on energy and nutrient metabolism in chicks has been investigated under thermoneutral and high temperatures. 2. The thyroidectomy caused hyperglycaemia in the thermoneutral and high temperatures, but the thyroidectomy did not alter the blood
