Proteinase K-sensitive sites are able to confer resistance to a wide range of proteases including those of animal or fungal origin and inhibitors of cysteine proteinases. In these proteases, the P1 residue is phenylalanine and the P2 residue is glutamic acid. Modification of the P2 residue of a plant proteinase K inhibitor (PKI) abolished the inhibition of cysteine proteinases. A membrane-spanning protein was isolated from cell wall-containing plasmodesmata-enriched tubule fractions. The proteinase K-sensitive site in the protein was identified using tryptic hydrolysis, N-terminal amino acid sequencing, and immunoblot analysis of the purified protein, and was shown to correspond to the P2 residue of PKI. The topology of PKI as determined by the localization of cell wall-spanning sites and the accessibility of trypsin to cysteine proteinases in protected inside-out plasma membrane vesicles was consistent with

Music and emotional disorders: factors influencing affect and auditory processing in depression, anxiety, and schizophrenia. The relative influence of emotional disorder, cognitive style, and musicality on affect and auditory perception was assessed using a musical emotion paradigm. Colpoys et al. (2004) reported that depressed adults, in contrast to non-depressed adults, prefer dissonant over dissonant-like melodies and the opposite pattern was observed for happy adults. A similar result was obtained with a similar listening task but with the musical material restricted to Western tonal scales, and the affective ratings of a larger participant group. Psychopathology is often associated with anomalous perceptual processing of speech and music (Porac and Silvia, 2011) and anomalous music perception and emotional processing (Keller, 1999), but direct comparisons using standardized emotional stimuli are extremely rare and aimed at non-clinical groups of musicians are virtually non-existent. Thus the purpose of the present investigation was to use a computerized and standardized musical emotion paradigm in order to assess the relative influence of emotional state, trait, and severity of disorder on the affective response, in a participant group with high intrinsic musicality (magnet musician). In addition, both emotional disorder and cognitive style were examined since a previous report (Colpoys et al., 2010) suggested that affective responses are associated with these factors. Results failed to provide conclusive evidence of any influence of symptom severity on affect or perception but depressed adults did exhibit differences in both response patterns and affective ratings. Surprisingly, the factor 'cognitive style' was found to have the greatest impact on affect. In addition, for the first time, this study investigated the influence of anxiety on affective response and perception in people with high symptom severity of a musical disorder, suggesting that exposure therapy to music could be a potential therapeutic tool in this group. The results of this study provide additional evidence of the influence of emotional disorder, and cognitive style, on emotional processing. However, the results also appear to suggest that parathetically associated factors can influence a significant part of the affective response.
