During the brazing process heat is transferred from the component that is being joined to a nearby fixture that supports the component. The clamping of the component around a brazing fixture causes the heat to be transferred to the fixture through the clamp, and the fixture then transfers the heat to the component via conduction. In many brazing applications, there is a need for a brazing fixture that is designed to be strong enough to hold the component during the brazing operation without causing the component to bulge away from its intended shape. In laser cladding, there is a need for a process that is capable of efficiently and reliably bonding a cladding material to a component. In either process, there is a need to provide heat that effectively transfers from the component to the fixture, and then efficiently transfers heat from the fixture to the component.
