A new porous Ni(2)P-loaded chitosan composite was prepared by a facile method in order to develop a bone repair scaffold. Ni(2)P is a widely used in dental implants because of its good biocompatibility. In this study, the biocompatibility, biodegradability, and osteogenic effect of this new biomaterial were evaluated. The results showed that the porous Ni(2)P-loaded chitosan composite scaffolds were obtained with a dense and strong structure, and the porous structure could be kept after biodegradation for approximately 4 weeks. This new scaffold has good biocompatibility with HEK 293 cells (the cell viability was above 80% and the cell-material interaction was still close to the control group after 15 days' in vitro culture), and it can enhance the proliferation and osteogenic differentiation of human mesenchymal stem cells (hMSCs) by accelerating alkaline phosphatase (ALP) activity and osteogenic gene expression of hMSCs. This material can be degraded and resorbed by the body and has a potential to be used as a new scaffold for bone regeneration.-induced nephropathy
