Methylmalonic acidemia presenting with reversible coma and seizures. In methylmalonic acidemia, a rare autosomal recessive disease of the heme metabolism, there is a deficiency of enzymatic activity of methylmalonyl-coenzyme A mutase which is responsible for the conversion of methylmalonyl-CoA to succinyl-CoA. The major clinical manifestations are neurologic with cerebellar ataxia, mental retardation, and spasticity. The course of the disease can be severe with frequent hospitalizations, even in childhood, and a potential need for total parenteral nutrition (TPN). This report describes two children with methylmalonic acidemia whose initial presentation was reversible coma and nonconvulsive seizures that responded promptly to the administration of medium chain triglycerides (MCT), which is a treatment that represents a potential benefit when given early in the course of the disease. Our observation of a good clinical response to MCT in these two patients shows that MCT is a useful tool in the acute management of some patients presenting with these symptoms.Improvement of oxidative stress by dietary flavonoids in erythrocytes of ovariectomized rat. Our previous study showed that consumption of wine, one of the flavonoid-rich beverages, reduced the risk of cardiovascular diseases in postmenopausal women. To investigate the precise mechanisms of the beneficial effect of wine consumption on atherosclerosis, the effects of dietary flavonoids on the susceptibility of erythrocyte to oxidative damage were investigated in erythrocytes of ovariectomized rat. Erythrocyte membranes showed significantly higher susceptibility to oxidation by incubation with lipid peroxidation (LPO) inducer, copper (II) ions, than those from sham-operated rats. Consumption of flavonoids-rich diet increased the susceptibility of erythrocyte membranes to oxidation by Cu(II), suggesting that protective actions of dietary flavonoids on atherosclerosis may be achieved, at least partly, through their potent antioxidant activity.Book Chapter: The Debt Trap?
