4 12 Elden Ring Announcement Sorry for replying so late. Sorry for replying so late. Details Changes Notes Downloads. 22.02.2015 ANNOUNCEMENT 1. We are one of the top-grossing action games on Steam at number 3 spot. 2. The launch period of Steam is short, so we will work to raise the number of downloads as quickly as possible. 3. We aim to release the version for NA and EU soon. 4. "Releasing" games nowadays require the following: A: A screenshot of the game must be uploaded to a server after the release. We intend to release images for the Netherlands and Germany on July 17th. (The purpose is to give reviewers access to the English version, which is not the case with the current version.) B: A variety of file types (images, videos, movies, music files, etc.) C: We may be requesting the English version of the game if there is one. D: In the event that we cannot generate screenshots or we cannot use any screenshots (temporary technical errors),

Does the HTTP 1.1 specification say anything about how it should be handled? A: You'll need to do something like this: but be aware that CGI is not the right solution for performance or security, especially on the web server. A: While this may sound a bit dated, rest assured that a question about CGI (or any web-based solution for that matter) will have years of wisdom on how to handle this stuff. First, in these situations, it's usually not the web server sending the post, but the web application server and the browser. The HTTP protocol is what you need to be totally clear on, not the semantics of CGI. You need three things to achieve this: You need the right HTTP protocol version. You need to specify how to interpret the post information in your web application You need to route this through your CGI program, to the correct application The HTTP protocol version is plain HTTP 1.0 or 1
