Name: Neurogenic neurocristic adenomyoma of the skin. Neurogenic neurocristic adenomyoma (NNCA) is a rare benign cutaneous neoplasm that typically presents as a blue-red, vascular, and scaling papule. These lesions can present with malignant transformation with squamous cell carcinoma, although little melanoma has been reported. Historically, the diagnosis of NNCA is not made until the tumor has been excised and examined histologically. Treatment is typically surgical, though limited case reports suggest that they can be managed with topical or intralesional therapy or without treatment in selected cases. This report describes a case of NNCA with an atypical presentation, involving the left temporal scalp, with diffuse redness, blue papules, superficial skin ulcers, and lymphedema of the left arm. A vascularized scalp nodule was excised and histologically diagnosed as NNCA. The NNCA reported here, to the best of our knowledge, has a clinical presentation distinct from those previously reported
