The roles of sphingosine-1-phosphate (S1P) and serotonin in the induction of pro-inflammatory cytokines during endotoxemia and hemorrhagic shock are reviewed. It has also been detected in endothelial cells, where it can exert paracrine effects, such as stimulation of nitric oxide (NO) release, modulation of endothelial cell physiology and leukocyte migration. S1P can act either as an extracellular mediator or as an intracellular second messenger. The activation of lysophosphatidic acid (LPA) receptors by S1P is involved in the immune response, and the inhibition of LPA2 and LPA3 receptors is associated with an alteration of inflammatory responses. Serotonin is a neurotransmitter that can be present in the nervous system. In the periphery, serotonin synthesis and release increase upon inflammatory stimuli. Changes in the level of central serotonin are known to contribute to the expression of the inflammatory response through direct or indirect mechanisms. Serotonin has been reported to have a dual role in the physiological regulation of blood pressure, but its involvement in the inflammatory response has not been clearly established. Thus, the administration of 5-hydroxytryptophan, a precursor of serotonin, has been used to determine the effects of central serotonin on peripheral inflammation during endotoxemia.
