The infradiaphragmatic and retroperitoneal pelvis can be approached in different ways by ultrasound. The evaluation of periurethral diverticulosis may be feasible using a transvaginal approach. To illustrate this, a case of adenomyosis of the pubic symphysis and a haemangioma of the fallopian tube are presented.Serum sialic acid in gynecologic cancer. Increased serum sialic acid levels are found in a number of clinical disorders and in malignant tumors. In this study, we explored the sialic acid level in preoperative and postoperative serum and synovial fluid of patients with gynecologic malignancies and correlated these results with tumor histology and clinical course. The study group included 36 patients who were retrospectively selected to have a biopsy-proven gynecologic malignancy. The control group included 23 patients with benign gynecologic diseases. Patients with ovarian cancer were defined as having stage I, stage II, stage III, or stage IV disease. Control subjects were selected to match the case patients for the type of surgery (hysterectomy and/or salpingooophorectomy vs simple excision of an ovarian mass), the presence of concomitant disease, the type of treatment received, and the age. A blinded laboratory technician performed the serum assays. A preliminary analysis of the data suggested that there was a statistically significant difference between preoperative and postoperative serum sialic acid levels in malignancy and between benign and malignant disease. For malignancy, the mean preoperative serum sialic acid level was 119.9 +/- 3.9 mg/dL and decreased to 104.7 +/- 11.2 mg/dL after surgery. All four patients with stage I disease had an increase in serum sialic acid level, and these levels returned to
