The US has long sought to control its war in Afghanistan, but is now resigned to the need for a more long-term presence in the country, which may eventually eclipse that in Iraq. By Tim Mackey FARGO, N.D. - The people in the rural province of Paktia in southern Afghanistan remain terrified, even though they have lived through years of vicious warfare that have tested the US's patience and its commitment to the country. They are just now discovering what a remarkably effective tool Google Earth is for mapping the most remote corners of the world, and seeing the paths of US military operations. At mid-morning on Oct. 20, four days after a suicide bomber struck a remote girls' school in the village of Mere d0c515b9f4
