A human placental extract containing ACTH was found to stimulate the production and release of C19 steroids from cultured human fetal adrenal cells. The steroidogenic effect of ACTH was dose-dependent and mimicked by synthetic ACTH-(1-24) and reverse-phase high-performance liquid chromatography verified that the steroid production originated from the added ACTH. In these studies, the cells were incubated in medium devoid of fetal calf serum and by comparison of stimulation of steroid production by ACTH and ACTH-(1-24) in serum-free medium, it is suggested that this effect is not a product of fetal calf serum. Maximum stimulation of cortisol production occurred after 5-7 days of culture. This effect of ACTH was inhibited by cycloheximide and puromycin, indicating that it depends on new protein synthesis. Puromycin also inhibited the rise in intracellular cyclic 3',5'-adenosine monophosphate which followed the addition of ACTH or ACTH-(1-24). The steroidogenic action of ACTH on the human fetal adrenal cell was similar to that reported for other fetal adrenals and adrenocortical cells. Adrenocorticotropin 6d1f23a050
