In modern TKA, some arthroplasty designs have focused on lateral unicompartamental knee arthroplasty (UKA). In lateral UKA, the tension of the lateral ligaments can be preserved by preserving the fibres of the lateral meniscus. However, medial unicompartamental knee arthroplasty (UKA) is technically challenging. In medial UKA, to preserve the fibres of the medial meniscus, the fibres of the medial collateral ligament (MCL) must be preserved. The aim of this biomechanical study was to compare the normalised abduction and adduction range of motion of lateral and medial UKA. Lateral UKA was based on a left knee, while the medial UKA based on a right knee. Thirteen fresh-frozen matched pair cadaveric knees were tested in a hydraulic testing machine. The knees were tested in full extension, 30° and 90° of flexion in the normal unloaded condition, in a valgus stress of 5, 10, 15 Nm with medial release. The normalised abduction and adduction range of motion of the lateral UKA was similar in the valgus stress of 5, 10 and 15 Nm ($p = 0.38$), while in normal knee, the range of motion of the lateral UKA was greater than that of the medial (p
