Adobe apps have traditionally been incredibly closed-off software. I'd take a list of reasons not to use them almost as long as I would to convince someone to use a paint program other than Photoshop. The heuristics are solid, though. In order to work really well at their jobs, they need to have access to all of their files. They also need to have access to your files. They don't have a lot of need to keep your stuff secret, because they have their own secret sauce. Being closed-off also helps with keeping the size of the programs lean. That's a cost they don't have to pay.

As part of the move to 3D and native 2D GPU rendering capabilities, Photoshop has completely rewritten and rebuilt its existing 3D feature set, as well as produced a brand new set of features to provide high resolution, real time printing. One of the standout parts from the release is the new ability to work with comic book based art in Photoshop CC. You can now use artwork from a range of comic books to create completely unique designs. “We've added new content-aware fill options, enhanced edge detection, added support for vibrant colors and new UI technologies including the Material Design UI system and lockable and copy and paste masked layers. Finally, we updated the 3D tools to use native support for GPU-accelerated rendering on macOS 10.14 and Windows 10, as well as updated our overall 2D/3D pipeline -- now with a completely overhauled 3D feature set and new high-resolution printing features.” Photoshop CC 2018 also includes an updated interface that leverages the new 3D and 2D capabilities, with additional features such as moving and resizing of 3D models, automatically adding depth and varying opacity, and printing high resolution images. The faster performance of the graphic design tools and features come with a price. Apple has come out with a new “Sacrificial Update” in which macOS 10.14 Mojave will require the macOS 10.13 High Sierra software update to continuously update your computer. That means if you are running Adobe CC 2018 your computer must have 6.7GB of available space because Photoshop CC 2018 uses additional space.
