After atropine administration, the effects of insulin on gastric acid secretion in normal and L-741,538-treated rats were determined in response to intravenous infusion of 3 mU/kg/5 min of the latter agent. In normal rats, insulin significantly inhibited gastric acid secretion by stimulating hypothalamic alpha-MSH release. After inhibition of insulin receptors with L-741,538, the acid-stimulatory effect of insulin was greatly enhanced. Gastric acid secretion from rats with vagotomy or treatment with L-741,538 and pylorus ligation were attenuated by insulin administration. The attenuated effect of insulin in vagotomized rats was significantly restored by i.v. administration of L-741,538. These results suggested that insulin exerted its action on gastric acid secretion through both peripheral and central pathway.Nonlinear analysis of the gas-liquid slug dynamics.
