The United Kingdom is the only major country to have not published an annual terrorism report since the series started. That has drawn criticism as the home secretary, Theresa May, embarked on a nationwide security review. She said last month she would not publish until the first half of the year, saying it would help gather the facts about what is happening in the country. London has suffered some of the worst of the seven jihadist attacks since the first report was published in 2003. A total of 25 were killed in the wake of the July 7 bombings and 23 after the murder of soldier Lee Rigby on the streets of south-east London. The name of the killer in the most recent murders remains a mystery, though the most recent crime took place just before the eighth anniversary of the 7/7 attack. Peter Clarke, the chief constable of the National Crime Agency, who leads the Met Police anti-terror team, said intelligence and resources were stretched. The Met Police will have to use "the savings from not funding the counter-terrorism unit fully" to pay for their 10-man team, Clarke told BBC Radio 4's Today programme. "What you have to realise is that is £120,000 per officer, and each officer there only has five days in a week to dedicate to counter-terrorism," he added. May has said the review will focus on "protecting the public from the threat of terrorism". It will involve bringing together the National Counter-Terrorism Security Office and other government departments, though the source of the money f
